Associative-sensitive graded persistent odor coding in the leopard gecko. The ability to discriminate odors with overlapping sensory features depends on odor intensity coding and is continuously improved by associative learning mechanisms. Here, we test whether the leopard gecko (Eublepharis macularius) can process odor similarities in a graded manner and, if so, whether its brain processes this in parallel with intensity coding. We show that geckos can learn to associate test and standard odors after a single conditioning trial, by demonstrating that the reward magnitude of test odors is comparable to that of trained odors. We further show that the leopard gecko's ability to detect changes in odor concentration is associated with changes in sensory features, that is, odor similarity, and that this ability depends on species-specific rapid olfactory learning mechanisms. Together, our results reveal that the leopard gecko has the computational capability of associative-sensitive graded odor coding.
